NEW GUIDELINES GOVERN REOPENINGS

Color is key
Gov. Gavin Newsom’s new color-coded process will move through a new four-tier system based on the number of cases and percentage of positive tests. It will rely on those same measurements to determine a tier: case rate and percentage of positive tests.

State issues color-coded tier system aimed at clarity; faces pushback

A new color-coded process for reopening pandemic-shuttered businesses in Los Angeles County and across the state was announced Friday, promising an easier way for businesses and counties to assess how soon they can fully reopen and a methodical, statistics-based system for getting there.

The measure, the product of more than a week of negotiations between Gov. Gavin Newsom, California Sen. Anna Caballero and Sen. Steve Glazer, Democrat of Orinda, would require tenants pay 120% of their current rent for the month of September. From October to December, tenants would pay between 180% and 240% of their current rent based on their incomes.

Some indoor business operations are closed; outdoor operations are open.

A new bill released Thursday for a new eviction moratorium that would protect tenants with COVID-19-related financial hardships from getting thrown out of their homes through January for not paying rent.

The measure, the product of more than a week of negotiations between state lawmakers, would require tenants pay 120% of their current rent for the month of September. From October to December, tenants would pay between 180% and 240% of their current rent based on their incomes.

The mother of an “ER” actress who died after being shot by police was turned out of her rental apartment, then helped small landlords and millions at risk deal with a confrontation with South Pasadena police officers, who disregarded the paramedics’ decisions that Marquez had a right to refuse to be taken to the hospital, and instead created a confrontation that led to her death, the office said.

The suit, which names ex-South Pasadena Chief Art Miller among the defendants, disputes law enforcement’s assertion that Marquez was shot when she brandished what officers believed to be a gun.

Marquez, known for her roles in the ABC/TV medical drama “ER” and the movie “Stand and Deliver,” had a history of seizures.

Pasadena, which operates its own health department that has reported steadily declining coronavirus cases in recent weeks, will likely align with Los Angeles county public health leaders in responding to the new orders for reopening issued by Gov. Gavin Newsom on Friday, said Lisa Derderian, the city’s spokesperson.

However, she said city health officials were not expecting Newsom’s order.

The mother of an “ER” actress shot to death at her home during a confrontation with South Pasadena police officers on Monday will file a wrongful death suit against the city, its former chief of police and several officers in federal court alleging civil rights violations.

Vanessa Marquez, 49, died in her South Pasadena home Monday night, according to police, who said they responded to a wellness check when a friend asked paramedics to check on her, according to Daily News reporter Danica McKenna’s Los Angeles federal court lawsuit that was filed Thursday.

Paramedics brought South Pasadena police officers, who disregarded the paramedics’ decisions that Marquez had a right to refuse to be taken to the hospital, and instead created a confrontation that led to her death, the office said.

The suit, which names ex-South Pasadena Chief Art Miller among the defendants, disputes law enforcement’s assertion that Marquez was shot when she brandished what officers believed to be a gun.
