CPS students push for cease-fire

Chicago high school students plan a sit-in protest Thursday to demand that the school district halt plans to allow armed, wearing Muslim head coverings, to be deployed to the Philadelphia region for the security of the Democratic National Convention.

By Aref Tufaha

The students, who said they were inspired by the sit-in by teachers at Chicago’s University High School several weeks ago, said they plan to form a human chain outside the district’s headquarters to demand that the district halt plans to allow teachers to be armed in the Philadelphia region for the convention.

The students said they were disturbed by the district’s decision to allow armed teachers to be deployed to the Philadelphia region for the convention, which they said was being used to divert attention from the district’s failure to address the needs of students who said they were being discriminated against.

“I believe that the district is acting in a way that is oppressing students and is not meeting the needs of our community,” said one of the students, who asked not to be identified.

“I feel that the district is not doing enough to address the needs of our students and is not doing enough to protect their rights,” said another student.

The students said they plan to form a human chain outside the district’s headquarters on Thursday to demand that the district halt plans to allow armed teachers to be deployed to the Philadelphia region for the convention.

The students said they were disturbed by the district’s decision to allow armed teachers to be deployed to the Philadelphia region for the convention, which they said was being used to divert attention from the district’s failure to address the needs of students who said they were being discriminated against.

“I believe that the district is acting in a way that is oppressing students and is not meeting the needs of our community,” said one of the students, who asked not to be identified.

“I feel that the district is not doing enough to address the needs of our students and is not doing enough to protect their rights,” said another student.

The students said they plan to form a human chain outside the district’s headquarters on Thursday to demand that the district halt plans to allow armed teachers to be deployed to the Philadelphia region for the convention.